The earliest forms of art are found in caves, for example in France, Spain and Australia. The lines are simple. They tell modern people a lot about the different species that lived then: the woolly mammoth, which also lived in prehistoric Britain, deer, and the ancestors of present-day cows. Such simplicity of line is also found in the sculptures from the Cycladic Islands, just off the coast of Greece. Huge monuments like Stonehenge were also erected in Scotland, Wales and in the north of France, in Brittany, from stones that had often travelled hundreds of kilometres. There was certainly excellent social organisation in ancient times, needed during the construction of these huge and perfect shapes. The building of the pyramids at Giza, just outside Cairo, is another good example.
